DEATHS.

At Kuklun, on the 15th instant, Agnes' Nee-son, late wife of the steamer Shanghai, aged 33 years.

At 7 p.m. on the 28th inst. at 22, Canton Road, Alice Jones, widow of the young son of the late Mr. Rose, of Public Works Department.

HONGKONG, SEPTEMBER 29TH, 1890.

In another column we reprint an interesting letter from South Formosa, which discloses a lamentable state of things in that island. The brave warrior Liu Min-kuo, a man we believe of excellent intentions, has hopelessly broken down as an administrator, and since the island was elevated from a dependency of Fukien into an independent province things have rapidly gone bad to worse. As it is tersely expressed by our Shanghai morning contemporary, Liu, when the change took place, set to work to reorganise the island; "he would have arsenals, railways, roads, steamers, a postal service, and he found plenty of advisers to show him how to spend his money while it lasted." The money is now all gone, and to raise the wherewithal to carry on the administration the people are being taxed to such an extent as to cause them to long for the advent of some foreign power to assume possession of the island and relieve them from their crushing burdens. No assistance, however, is likely to come from that quarter, and the people will have to wait for relief until an alteration of policy on the part of their rulers takes place. That time might perhaps be hastened by their own efforts, for the populace in China are able to bring considerable pressure to bear

As,

The rest of the book is occupied with Niu's attempts, failing through his friend Perkins' aid, to secure Chou, now a pirate, and the trials of the marriage of Broderick and Willow with her cousin the priest. In the course of the story we are told many things which we hardly believe in. For instance, that the Chinese, who are quite exceptional in China, are night-fighters who go about with a wooden drum and form, by twos, the record of police magistrates; that pirates are tortured at Victoria Hongkong (which is a walled city), and are carried to the place of execution there doubled up in cages; that many Chinese vessels may under certain circumstances be forced to strike into a criminal by the side of death. A Chinese woman kills her daughter, a Chinese Provincial Judge sends tears and embraces an English smuggler. The last scene takes place inside Canton city (to which he had thought no foreigners were admitted in the first place). And a third joyful accomplishment of the fat author is that the Provincial Judge (a friend of his) gave his arm to Mme. Liou. It's pleasant that of his cousin to his heart, and followed, by Perkins and Sir Arthur Murray, they passed under the arches of foliage erected in their honour to the door of the widow's house. If this be a faithful picture of Chinese manners, as far as they are concerned, we have lived hitherto in a delusion. Life and art no more worth to call in question the value of China, however extravagant it may appear to our narrow ignorance and self-satisfied inexperience. — N. C. Daily News.

FILIAL DEVOTION.

A Shanghai native paper says:—The following incident shows how great the love of children for their parents sometimes is. There was a man who had to flee many years ago from his native place Woohow, on account of his participation in the Taiping rebellion. He sought a refuge in Shanghai, settled there, started a business, and, in course of time, by thrift and industry, became a man. He had, however, acquired a fortune which enabled him to enjoy all the things of this world, and afford a little occasionally to help a needy neighbour, which he could do whenever it was possible; but he was also blessed with the richest gift the deities could confer upon a mortal,—he was in the happy possession of a frank, prudent, and upright son. Now, this son, who differed from what might be called the average for those who had the advantage of being reared by such a mother, as the event proved. Some time ago this good man fell sick, and languished beyond the power of man to alleviate his pang. His wife in vain procured the most skilful doctors, named him tenderly, and prepared herself before the deities, who had hitherto regarded him as a son in whom they had placed the resources of the kingdom, and the progress of the good wife, who was so earnest that she took no notice of a severe injury she received on the forehead in knowing to the gods were allies of truth, and her hapless husband was on the point of death. The man's children had all this time been half distract at their mother's conduct, and at their own inability to help him. When, however, his bed-side administered pain-killing, and all the little offices which filial duty demands from a child when a father is gravely sick. They were a son of 17 years, and two daughters of 18 and 19 respectively; the boy was renowned for his bravery, intellect, and strength, and the girls, like their mother, for their virtue and beauty. Night and day they watched by their father and vainly tried to think of some means to relieve him. At last they resolved to use a desperate remedy—the suggestion came from the younger girl, and they quietly withdrew from the sick chamber to put their resolve into immediate execution. Even to those who may have no personal connection or acquaintance with them, the story is touching, and a picture of filial piety and self-sacrifice which cannot be easily eradicated from the memory of all who hear it.

measurement of the length of a piece of shirting, the Customs-officials must exercise considerable charity in their conclusions as to the infringement of the stamping clause, which are likely to be wrong as right.— Times of India.

POZO AND ITS RISKS.

Sir F. Roberts, Commander-in-Chief in India, has issued a general order in reference to polo. Objectives to the game, he says, may be included under two heads: (1) danger and (2) expense. As to the danger of the game his Excellency says:—“Accidents have recently become very numerous, and within the last few months several young and promising officers have lost their lives, with other serious injuries, through the same.” In speaking of the dangers of the game, Sir Frederick Roberts desires at the outset to deprecate any idea that he would encourage an amusement or exercise simply in itself.

Any consideration of this description he knows must be repugnant to officers of the army, and to those of life or death, and he would be sorry if any of his compatriots, whatever the nature of duty or of legitimate recreation, it must continue to be accepted with little or no thought being given to the risk involved. But when danger is not inseparable from a pastime and does not even add to its interest, and when risk of injury can to a great extent be avoided by ordinary precautions without detracting from the merits of a game, it becomes a duty to reduce danger to a minimum.

The chief sources of danger are:—

(1) The increased height of the ponies and the higher speed which any success in the game now necessitates. The height has been gradually rising since the first introduction of the game, and now stands at 133 hands; but owing to the nature of the ponies, which are not quite possible for a pony to be considerably over the standard height while correctly measured and certified as within it.

(2) The use of imperfectly broken and badly bitted ponies, when high speed is indispensable, in matches. Ponies cannot be trained without play, but they need not be ridden to the risk of a fall, and until thoroughly broken in, it is difficult to teach them that it should be recognised as a rule in all polo clubs that no pony is allowed to be used, except at practice, until it has been passed as thoroughly broken to the game.

(3) The neglect to wear a head-dress capable of protecting the head in case of a fall; or if such a head-dress were worn, as is the case with the men of distinction, as it is at the present day. This source of danger is absolutely preventable, and here again the Commander-in-Chief considers that the rules of all clubs should provide that a substantial head-dress is invariably to be worn at all times, even at the cost of some occasional inconvenience. It is certain that loss of life has frequently occurred through the neglect of this precaution.

In conclusion, with the question of danger Sir Frederick Roberts desires to impress upon officers that there is no merit in running objects down risks, but rather the reverse. Natural lamelessness may make young men careless of their ponies, but there are others whose feelings should be considered. Even to those who may have no personal connection or acquaintance with them, the story is touching, and a picture of filial piety and self-sacrifice which cannot be easily eradicated from the memory of all who hear it.
